Not illustrated. 1846 Excerpt: ...hollowness for granted, the void is to be supposed filled with light or any other ether, but only to observe that the experiment before us strikes most completely at the preliminary assumption. Maskelyne made the earth to be a ball five times as dense as the same bulk of water; Cavendish, five times and a half; but Mr. Bally, whose experiments are far more numerous and well supported, five times and two-thirds. The solid rocks with which the geologist professes that his knowledge of the interior strata of our earth terminates, are only between three and four times as heavy as water: barytes itself, which takes its name from the great density of its compounds, has one of the heaviest of those compounds, the sulphate, under four times and a half its weight of water. If we were to ask what substance must be chosen, so that a globe uniformly consisting of that substance might take the place of our earth in the planetary system, retaining its size, the answer would be that nothing under the ores of silver or the lighter ores of lead would serve the purpose. The increase of density, then, from the surface towards the centre, is fully confirmed by this experiment: a highly probable result of the theory of gravitation is made as sure as any result can be. But while we thus admire the manner in which one inquiry is made to confirm the consequences of another, we must not forget that it is no small part of our province to apply the conclusions of sound knowledge to Elements of Natural Philosophy, vol. i. p. 453.
